CHIANG Chung-yung (蔣中脩), who is out of sympathy with the pro-Chinese Communist elements in the Democracy Promotion Association, attempted to organize a corps to maintain law and order in Canton during the interregnum period. Connected with this effort was a plan to take over large stocks belonging to the Kuomintang and sell them at a large profit to the Chinese Communists after the fall of Canton. This plan was discovered by the left wing elements and found objectionable. This, coupled with other actions of CHIANG, led to his expulsion from the Democracy Promotion Association and from his position as secretary of the Kuomintang Revolutionary Committee.
